

Abstract

Methods use concurrent multiple cellular probes conjugated to fluorescent compounds of different wavelengths to characterize single cells that have been isolated from a body fluid using density gradient centrifugation. Specific antibodies, peptides, nucleotides or oligonucleotides are used as probes for both identification and characterization of a single cell.